

ALAMO MASSACRE

Andrea Castañón Villanueva

Seeking independence from Mexico, a volunteer army of United States settlers drove Mexican forces out of San Antonio, Texas, in December 1835. Three months later, thousands of Mexican soldiers retaliated in an attack on Fort Alamo. Approximately 200 Texan men, women, and children were inside the fort at the time of the attack. Survivors included noncombatants (women and children, and an African-American slave) and one Texan soldier. Andrea Castañón Villanueva was among those to survive. In this article from the San Antonio Light, Villanueva recalls the battle she saw inside the fort.

THINK THROUGH HISTORY: Recognizing Bias

Which side did Villanueva support in the battle she described? What clues did you use in reaching your conclusion?

We all knew that we were doomed, but not one was in favor of surrendering. A small herd of cattle had been driven inside of the walls and we had found a small quantity of corn that had been stored by the priests. The great front door had been piled full of sand bags and there was a bare hope that we might hold out until General Houston sent a reinforcement.

There was just 177 men inside of the Alamo and up to this time no one had been killed, though cannon had thundered against us and several assaults had been made. Colonel Travis was the first man killed. He fell on the southeast side near where the Menger Hotel stands. The Mexican infantry charged across the plaza many times and rained musket balls against the walls, but they were always made to recoil. Up to the morning of the 6th of March, the cannon had done us little damage, though the batteries never ceased firing. Colonel Crockett frequently came into the room and said a few encouraging words to Bowie. This man came to San Antonio only a few days before the invasion. The Americans extended him a warm welcome. They made bonfires in the streets and Colonel Crockett must have made a great speech, for I never heard so much cheering and hurraing in all my life. They had supper at my hotel and there was lots of singing, story telling and some drinking. Crockett played the fiddle and he played well if I am any judge of music. He was one of the strangest looking men I ever saw. . . . I could not regard him as a hero until I saw him die. He looked grand and terrible standing in the door and fighting a whole column of Mexican infantry. He had fired his last shot and had no time to reload. The cannon had knocked away the sand bags and the infantry was pouring through the breach. Crockett stood there swinging something bright over his head. The place was full of smoke and I could not tell whether he was using a gun or a sword. A heap of dead was piled at his feet and the Mexicans were lunging at him with bayonets, but he would not retreat an inch. Poor Bowie could see it all, but he could not raise up from his cot. Crockett fell and the Mexicans poured into the Alamo.

[Now Villanueva backtracks in her narrative and describes in further detail the Mexicans' final assault on the Alamo.]

I sat by Bowie's side . . . and tried to keep him as composed as possible. He had a high fever and was seized with a fit of coughing every few moments. Colonel Crockett loaded Bowie's rifle and a pair of pistols and laid them by his side. The Mexicans ran a battery of several guns out on the plaza and instantly began to rain balls against the sand bags. It was easy to see that they would soon clear every barricade from the front door, but Crockett assured Bowie that he could stop a whole regiment from entering. I peeped through the window and saw long lines of infantry, followed by dragoons, filing into the plaza, and I notified Colonel Crockett of the fact. "All right," said he. "Boys, aim well." The words had hardly died on his lips before a storm of bullets rained against the walls and the very earth seemed to tremble beneath the tread of Santa Anna's yelling legions. The Texans made every shot tell and the plaza was covered with dead bodies. The assaulting columns recoiled and I thought we had beaten them, but hosts of officers could be seen waving their swords and rallying the hesitating and broken columns.

They charged again and at one time, when within a dozen steps of the door, it looked as if they were about to be driven back, so terrible was the fire of the Texans. Those immediately in front of the great door were certainly in the act of retiring when a column that had come obliquely across the plaza reached the southwest corner of the Alamo and, bending their bodies, they ran under the shelter of the wall to the door. It looked as if a hundred bayonets were thrust into the door at the same time and a sheet of flame lit up the Alamo. Every man at the door fell but Crockett. I could see him struggling with the head of the column and Bowie raised up and fired his rifle. I saw Crockett fall backwards. The enraged Mexicans then streamed into the building firing and yelling like madmen. The place was full of smoke and the death screams of the dying, mingled with the exultant shouts of the victors, made it a veritable hell. A dozen or more Mexicans sprang into the room occupied by Colonel Bowie. He emptied his pistols in their faces and killed two of them. As they lunged towards him with their muskets I threw myself in front of them and received two of their bayonets in my body. One passed through my arm and the other through the flesh of my chin. . . . I implored them not to murder a sick man, but they thrust me out of the way and butchered my friend before my eyes. All was silent now. The massacre had ended. One hundred and seventy-six of the bravest men that the world ever saw had fallen and not one had asked for mercy. I walked out of the cell and when I stepped upon the floor of the Alamo the blood ran into my shoes.

THINK THROUGH HISTORY: ANSWER

Villanueva supported the Anglo-American Texans. She described their bravery in battle and how they died without asking for mercy. She described Colonel Bowie and Colonel Crockett in a heroic manner. She also attempted to save the life of Colonel Bowie.
